

On the funding of ResPublica

ResPublica is an independent, non-partisan and not-for-profit think tank with charitable aims. Through our policy innovation, events and research programmes, we seek to establish a new economic, social and cultural settlement for the United Kingdom. Our work is structured around three founding principles – Society, Prosperity and Virtue.

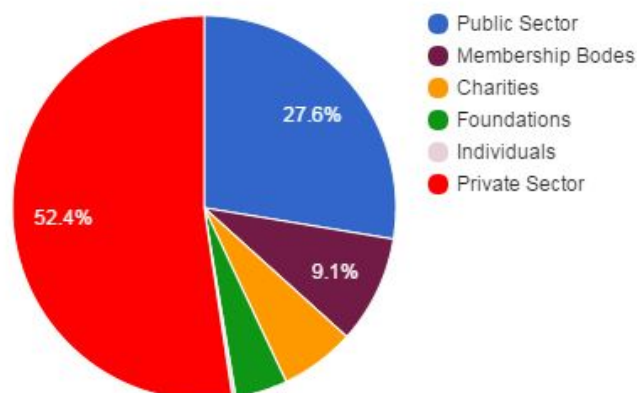

ResPublica receives no core funding, nor funding from political parties which would compromise our independence. Instead, all of our work is project funded, from a diverse range of partners including individuals, foundations, private sector groups and not-for-profits. We value the input and expertise of our partners, but are fiercely proud of our independence and objectivity. We retain full editorial control of all of our events, research and reports. We will not undertake work that does not meet our non-partisan or ethical standards, and at no point allow our outcomes to be determined by external partners.

All of our output and operations are held to account by our board of trustees, details of whom can be found on our website.
