

On the funding of ResPublica

ResPublica is an independent and non-partisan public policy think tank.

Through our policy innovation, events and research programmes we seek to establish a new economic, social and cultural settlement for the United Kingdom. Our work is structured around three founding principles – Society, Prosperity and Virtue.

ResPublica receives no core funding. Instead, all of our work is project funded from a diverse range of partners including those in the private sector, public sector and not-for-profits. We value the input and expertise of our partners, but place a high emphasis on our independence and objectivity and therefore retain full editorial control of all of our output.

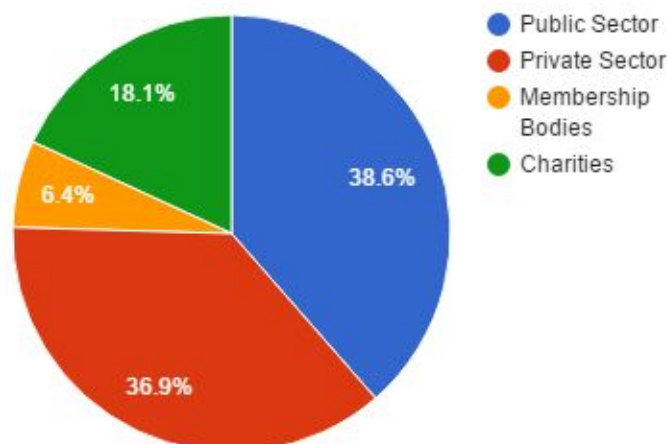

ResPublica is an independent organisation and the content we produce reflects this. Any sponsor, partner or contributing company that joins the funding of a piece of research is given no right of veto over anything written, recommended or advocated in reports or any of its public representation and transmission. Our status as innovative, independent thinkers is a fundamental and sacrosanct part of our identity.

These standards and procedures are upheld by our board of trustees, details of whom can be found on our website.
